

TEAMING TO DELIVER RESULTS

VIDEO TRANSCRIPT

Accenture and Microsoft Partnership

Jason: We often talk about how Accenture runs on Microsoft, and very much we believe the productivity suite that Microsoft 365 provides really is the foundation for which our nearly 600,000 people around the globe operate every day.

Jeff: We worked with the team for well over a decade from the earliest days of cloud transformation, and Accenture has been the largest, and most aggressive and most innovative company in terms of pushing us not just for their employees, but obviously for clients.

Jason: Whether you're talking about experience and accessibility in support of an overall experience for all folks, its productivity of course, reliability and security, these are the things that we foundationally believe that we need to have in all of the platforms and applications that we enable our people with. And when you have an organization, a partner like Microsoft that obsesses to the same degree that you do about bringing these things to your people, it means that the alignment right there is just so core to everything we do.

Jeff: There's an incredibly high degree of trust between the organizations that lets us speak very frankly to each other.

Jason: We're happy to have the relationship that allows us to understand what's coming, but also to understand what is going to work and what maybe is giving our people some challenges that we can give as feedback to the engineering team to make those things work better for us and ultimately for all of Microsoft's customers.

Jeff: There's an incredibly constructive back and forth about product capabilities, about culture about guidance and just a really deep partnership.

Jason: It's important to work with Microsoft as a deep partner and view them as being a part of your team to help deliver results.
